This talk will describe preliminary research at the US Air Force Academy to create computer programs that recognize features in images. An overview of neural networks and convolutional neural networks will be given, along with a description of both supervised and unsupervised learning strategies. Finally, results from training a convolutional neural network to recognize patterns, and then using this network to examine new images (not from the training set) will be shown, along with some ideas for future directions.